WORK IN PROGRESS

State Responses to Energy Insecurity

This book project examines how the major advanced industrialized democracies have perceived and dealt with the problem energy insecurity. Particular attention is devoted to the policy responses of the United States, Britain, France, Germany, and Japan first in the 1970s and then in the 2000s. The project describes and explains the significant variations that have occurred in these responses and then explores their implications for international cooperation to promote energy security. I have conducted extensive field research in Europe and Japan with the support of the German Marshall Fund of the United States and Georgia State University.
